

Camille Henrot and son Iddu at her solo exhibition «Mother Tongue» in Hannover, Germany.

Milkyways

The bird mother

Is it OK to have a child? Is it OK to make art? Or is the footprint they leave destroying the planet? In her second column, Camille Henrot explores one of the ethical dilemmas of our times.

By Camille Henrot (art and text), Antje Stahl (editor) and Rafael Heygster (photography), 24.04.2021

English Deutsch

Over the past few weeks I've been busy installing the exhibition «Mother Tongue» at the Kestner Gesellschaft in Hannover, Germany. For the first time I am showing a large body of work from a new series of paintings and drawings about motherhood titled «Wet Job», «System of Attachment» and «Soon». In addition, in the centre of the exhibition space, the curator Julika Bosch and I decided to place the sculpture titled «3, 2, 1».

I made the sculpture at the Kunstgiesserei St. Gallen, which was kind enough to invite me for a residency last summer. Mauro, Iddu and I had just left New York as my visa was about to expire and the city, like so many others, was forced into a full lockdown. We travelled to Zurich, where Mauro and his family looked after Iddu while I worked with a wonderful crew in St. Gallen.

Partner Mauro Hertig and son Iddu accompanied the artist to set up the exhibition.

It probably goes without saying that being separated from her child makes a so-called working mom feel conflicted – she’s happy to find the time to immerse herself in her work, yet she also feels guilty for not being able to spend time with her kid. When it comes to motherhood, feelings of public and private responsibility collide. This conflict is compounded by a mother’s fear of losing the world she grew up in, especially when she is constantly reminded of its imminent destruction. According to calculations made by scientists Seth Wynes and Kimberly Nicholas, global carbon emissions would be dramatically reduced if people not only ate less meat and took fewer transatlantic flights but also if they had fewer children.

In an essay titled «Is it OK to have a child?» (which I paraphrased at the outset), Meehan Crist critiques mathematical models that purport to have a-

The bronze sculpture «3, 2, 1» on its «nest» of leftover material.

Only recently, when we moved to Berlin, did I discover the word «Rabenmutter». The expression compares a bad mother to a raven who kicks out her offspring too early and neglects them. I was very surprised that the word does not associate the mother with the strength that the bird represents in mythology: the raven is a super clever animal that serves as a messenger for gods and saints, a caretaker and truth teller in times of crises.

My mother worked as an artist and as a bird taxidermist for the dioramas in the natural history museum in Paris. She could imitate the birds' voices, and she prepared them for an eternal stuffed life after their death. In our apartment in Paris there was a room filled with all sorts of metallic wire, stuffing material, feathers, dried plants and animal corpses. There was also a drawer full of fake eyes in different colours. I wasn't allowed to play there. When, nevertheless, I did one day, all the eyes fell out and rolled all over the floor.

A little bird in Camille's hand, photographed in 1988 by her mother, Maud Greder. Maud Greder

About the artist

At the 55th Venice Biennale, French artist Camille Henrot was awarded the Silver Lion for her video «Grosse Fatigue», among others. Since she gave birth to her son, she has both intellectually and artistically been exploring the ambivalent feelings associated with so-called motherhood. She, her partner, the Swiss composer Mauro Hertig, and her son Iddu are based in Berlin.